Course description:

This course explores the role and influence of special advisers, or “spin doctors”, in politics. Through several case studies, we will see how politicians are “shaped”, trained, some might even say “groomed” to seduce potential voters. Over the past few decades, the professionalisation of politics has made the use of spin doctors necessary, even if their role is still not well-known, for obvious reasons: politicians have to appear “natural”, benevolent and worthy of trust. The communication “machine” behind them has therefore to remain hidden, in the background. This course will shed some light on this fascinating aspect of political communication.

The course therefore examines how the image of politicians is shaped by various photo-ops and other publicity stunts, but also thanks to their speeches and overall political communication. Special attention will be paid to discourse analysis and the role of metaphors and narratives in political speeches.

Prerequisites:

Basic knowledge of political communication.

Course objectives:

The main objective of this course is to better understand how effective and professional political communication helps politicians come across as trustworthy. We will see what is going on behind the scenes and try to make sense of the current political situation in the UK, the US and in France.

Assessment: [at least 2 marks, one for the final written exam in class and one for a mid-term/oral presentation ...]

30%: Mid-term written exam

70%: group presentation and group dossier at the end of the semester

Attendance:

In order to participate, students must be present. Nevertheless, a maximum of 2 (two) unexcused absences will be allowed; otherwise no mark will be given. An unexcused absence at a test (final test or continuous assessment) means no credits for the course.
